Herzog's photographs are as haunting as they are beautiful. He captures images of ancient ruins, abandoned churches, and desolate landscapes, all of which seem to be imbued with a sense of mystery and dread. The people who inhabit these images are often obscured or out of focus, adding to the feeling of unease.

Accompanying Herzog's photographs are his own enigmatic writings. These texts range from short poems to extended essays, and they provide a fascinating insight into Herzog's own thoughts on the occult. He writes about the power of dreams, the nature of evil, and the possibility of life after death.
